Very Far Apart.

The case was one of those in which the testimony of the opposing parties was exactly contradictory, but the jury seemed to regard the evidence of the plaintiff and her witnesses.

Argument on the instructions to the jury occupied one whole day. The point of law around which the argument revolved was the "privileged communication," and the lack of reliable precedent was the cause for much dispute. Judge Wells finally instructed the jury that if it believed that the alleged slander in the regular order of court proceedings, and with only the intention of throwing more light on the case at bar, then the alleged slander was not actionable. But by its verdict the jury decided that Mrs. Oppleman had speken the words from a malicious desire to injure the reputation of Miss Profitt.

MAY RECONSIDER VOTE

Council Being Closely Canvassed on Wharf Proposition.

Sharp canvassing for votes has begun in an effort to secure a reconsideration of the vote by which the James River wharf provote by which the James River wharf pro-position was rejected by the Common Coun-cil on Monday night. An effort will be made to reconsider the vote to-morrow night when the Council meets in adjourned ses-sion. The vote of the five absentees would have altered the result. The measure car-rying an appropriation required a two-thirds vote in the lower branch, or twenty-seven of the forty members in the affirmative. It stood twenty-three ayes, twelve noes, and five absent. water mains, the mains under the roadway and the ducts in sidewalk.

Luten Explains Design.

The designs submitted by the Carolina Concrete Company, of Greensboro, N. C., were explained by Daniel B. Luten, an expert bridge engineer and consulting engineer for the National Bridge Company, of Indianapolis.

He had submitted eight main bids, varying in cost from $187,000, the lowest bid submitted, to $244,200. These, he explained, were based on two general designs, the variations being due to optional forms of paving, railing and other items of an ornamental character. Both designs propose an arch bridge and earth filled roadway, with filled construction across the island. Mr. Luten explained that he proposed arches of solid concrete without grill work, with the main spans eighty-six feet between centres, which would be ample to prevent lodging of drift. The height would be five feet above the present structure. The bridge, he said, was designed to carry 100-ton cars in train, on both tracks, and was guaranteed for one year for the whole amount of the contract against any defect in plan or workmanship, "If concrete work of this character stands for one year," he explained, "it will stand for eternity." The bridge could be delivered in 240 working days.

His design as to general appearance from either side, he said, had been submitted to Sir Moses Ezeklel, the famous sculptor, once of Richmond and now of Rome, who had suggested the advisability of erecting four ornamental bronze figures—one of William Byrd, one of Powhatan, one of a Confederate soldier, and one of a Revolutionary soldier. Sir Moses, he said, had offered to design these figures without cost to the city, as a gift to his native place. They might be mounted on abutments at either side of Mayo's Island. The casting and settling, he estimated, would cost about $12,000.
